This book is an important reading to anyone who wants to understand the reality of the contours of asylum, gender and state power in the UK, and beyond from the situated gaze of women asylum seekers. The book shows, from different angles, how the structural violence and oppression inherent in British asylum and everyday bordering policies and practices tend to often add to, rather than heal, traumas these women have undergone before and during their migration processes in their struggles for survival.

Nira Yuval-Davis, Professor, Director of the Research Centre on Migration, Refugees and Belonging (CMRB), University of East London, UK

"Metically documenting state crime, harm and violence targeted against women seeking asylum, Canning skilfully deploys her academic-activist feminist standpoint to explode the myth of the refugee 'crisis'. At the same time, she insists that the silence which is integral to state power can be and is being challenged through collective social action. Gendered Harm and Structural Violence in the British Asylum System is part of that resistance movement."

Steve Tombs, Professor, Head of Social Policy & Criminology at the Open University and Co-Director of the International Centre for Comparative Criminological Research, UK

"This book, Canning provides a thoughtful, contextually grounded and meticulous critique of the British asylum system that is searing in itsattery. Canning reminds us that Britain's asylum systems and structures compound trauma, produce harm and perpetuate violence on those who arrive seeking humanitarian protection. A decade of research and advocacy has contributed to this book and the considered analysis offers immense value to researchers, advocates and practitioners."

Nicola Gerard, Associate Professor in Law and Director of the Centre for Law and Justice, Charles Sturt University, Australia

"In this book, Canning provides a thoughtful, contextually grounded and meticulous critique of the British asylum system that is searing in its scrutiny. Canning reminds us that Britain's asylum systems and structures compound trauma, produce harm and perpetuate violence on those who arrive seeking humanitarian protection. A decade of research and advocacy has contributed to this book and the considered analysis offers immense value to researchers, advocates and practitioners."

This is a must read for anyone who wants to gain understanding of the structural harms and violence inflicted on people seeking asylum by the British state and its corporate allies. In this book, Canning has conducted an excellent feminist analysis of torture and harm, and given voice to the voiceless, drawing narratives of survival and resistance. This is a necessary and much needed contribution to critical criminology and feminism.

Victoria Canning is a Lecturer in Criminology at The Open University, UK. For the past decade she has been involved in feminist and asylum rights campaigns in the North West of England. She is co-ordinator of the Prisons, Punishment and Detention Working Group with the European Group for the Study of Deviance and Social Control and, among other affiliations, is an activist with Merseyside Women's Movement.